All the information Cute Reminder stores for you is classified depending on how it relates to a time. There are only three simple categories: Reminders, Notes and Ideas. The following table comments that classification. Reminders are pieces of information tightly bound to a specific time. For example, if you have a meeting on Monday at 11:00 AM then you should set up a reminder, which will appear on your desktop at the specified time prompting you on the event. If you have a deadline, you set up a reminder to allow you to do the work in a timely fashion. Notes are pieces of information not bound to a specific deadline. You use notes to remind you to do something when you have time. For example, you create a note in order not to forget to write a letter to a friend. Or, you can make a note to store temporary information such as a phone number or address. The notes are placed on your desktop, and they remain visible unless you hide them. Ideas are pieces of information, which is unproven, unreliable, or incomplete. This kind of information does not assume any deadlines or immediate actions. You use ideas to avoid wasting your resources and time working on fuzzy goals.

Just think of all of the smart, well-educated, experienced managers and executives devoting so much of their
